

Arrangements for Health Surveillance

Health surveillance is provided to employees who are or may be exposed to substances or emissions that could cause ill health. Health surveillance is provided to employees before they are exposed to substances or emissions. Health surveillance is carried out by a person who is competent to do so. Health surveillance is provided at suitable intervals. Reports on the results of health surveillance are provided to employees and retained by the company. Action is taken to further control risks and protect employees, based on the findings of health surveillance carried out.
